The surface condenser has a cooling surface of 2,200 square feet composed of tinned brass tubes of small diameter. The alternator on each of the three sets is of the revolving field type, with fixed armature, and has an output, under normal conditions, of 160 kilowatts at a tension of 500 volts, with a frequency of 50 periods each second when working on a circuit having a power factor of 85 per cent. The armature consists of a cast-iron frame carrying soft iron core plates well insulated from one another and so arranged as to give plenty of room for ventilating the core and windings. The armature windings are of insulated cable, separately former wound in micanite tubes, and all high tension windings are enclosed so as to be inaccessible from the engine room. The magnet windings are of copper wire, 100 degrees conductivity, former wound, and are arranged so as to obtain sufficient ventilation. The insulation of the armature and magnet windings is such as to withstand a test with pressures of 1,500 and 1,000 volts alternating current respectively, and the estimated efficiency when working on a circuit having a power factor of 85 per cent. varies The switch-board, of which diagrams and illustrations are shown, is very complete, and is fitted with every modern contrivance.
