Excerpt: . . . WALTHAM EVENING INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL, WALTHAM, MASS. The industrial evening schools in Waltham are a result of a canvass of the machinists of the city. A large number of them had previously attended a hearing and asked the school committee to furnish them instruction which would advance them in their calling. The committee invited the Massachusetts Commission on Industrial Education to attend this meeting, and at its conclusion, when the desire of the men for this instruction was evident, asked the commission to establish a school. Instruction. --The work as outlined for these young machinists has been mechanical drawing, shop mathematics and machine shop practice, every man taking each course one night per week. While the results of this plan cannot be forecast with certainty, the present interest and the large waiting list combined show that the workmen themselves feel that it is giving them the instruction which they need. Equipment. ---The machine shop and mechanical drawing equipment of the manual training high school is available for this work. For the shop mathematics the lecture hall of the high school is used, and, as it is equipped with a lantern, it is evident that lectures on various subjects pertaining to the work of the machinists can be given without great expense and in a most interesting manner. The dominant industry of Waltham is shown in the character of the men applying for instruction, and in the kind of work which they feel would be the...
