Excerpt: .the wave, No--Venus was never my daughter-- To golden-haired Iris her being I gave, Behold where she shines o'er the water. When filled with thoughts of life's young day, Alone in distant climes we roam, And year on year has rolled away, Since last we viewed our own dear home. Oh, then at evening's silent hour, In chamber lone or moonlit bower; How sad on memory's listening ear, Come long lost voices sounding near, Like the wild chime of village bells Heard far away in mountain dells. II. But, ah! for him let kind hearts grieve, His time of youth and exile o'er, Who treads on life's declining eve, With altered eyes his native shore, With sinking heart and weary brain, Who treads those lonesome scenes again And backward views those sunny hours When first he knew those ruined...
